No Pushing

Well, the subject I had intended for this editorial just fell through, so I guess I’ll dredge up my standard advice-for-frosh(it is getting late, and there is the rest of the paper to do), so here goes: At Tech, people will rarely push you into doing things. This situation is really a mixed blessing. While you won’t be forced to do things you don’t like, you also won’t be nudged to do things you should do, but put off, and you won’t be pushed to do things that you might like, if you only tried them.

Tech has a pretty diverse range of things to do or get involved in. From academic research to newspaper work(hint, hint) to competitive sports, the opportunities wait for you. And the key word is wait, for you must seek them, they will not look for you.

With, perhaps, one exception if we don’t get some more staff for this monthly yellow sheet, I may revive the old Royal Navy press-gang, and come by and collate some of you. Think it over, huh?

Have fun at Camp, and I’ll see you there. —ed. Biedechi

The Hugos

by Gavin Claypool

Frederik Pohl’s Gateway was awarded the Hugo for best novel of 1977 at the 36th World Science Fiction Convention, held Labor Day weekend in Phoenix, Arizona.

It was the third major award for Pohl in less than eighteen months. Gateway also received the best novel Nebula, presented for science fiction writers of America last April, and a year earlier his novel Man Plus was similarly honored.

Runners-up, announced after the award ceremony, were The Forbidden Tower by Marion Zimmer Bradley, and Lucifer’s Hammer by Larry Niven and Jerry Pournelle. Also among the final nominees were Dying of the Light (“After the Festival”) by George R. R. Martin, and Time Storm by Gordon R. Dickson.

The convention’s guest of honor, Harlan Ellison, became the second writer to be awarded two Hugos in the fiction categories. His most recent winner, Jeffrey’s Elvis, was also given the Nebula for best short story of 1977.
